Amax Security lights up its new fire service

Fast expanding security systems installer Amax Security, which offers a flexible one-stop service to residential and commercial customers around the UK, has recruited George Melpous to head up its new fire systems division.

The move coincides with Patrick Tomlinson's promotion to the post of Technical Sales Manager. Patrick is now maximising the advantages of Amax's in-house training and career progression programme for the long-term benefit of the company's customers.

Meanwhile George, whose industry experience includes spells with major fire specialists including Wormald, is helping Amax Security's clients with a full range of fire detection, alarm and extinguishing services. These include risk assessments and premises surveys, along with emergency lighting equipment, sprinklers, gas suppression systems, dry risers and extinguishers (including staff training on their correct selection and operation).

"Using our strengths in both fire and security, we can make the best use of both types of system by integrating them," George says. "For instance, CCTV cameras being used for surveillance protection can offer added value by helping to confirm whether a fire alarm is genuine.

"But the main difference that Amax offers its customers is our personalised service. Unlike the large, national providers we will react to your requirements by getting things done quickly and efficiently using the correct solution and reliable, cost-effective equipment."

Amax Security's fire alarm systems conform to the strict requirements of BS5839 and are specified, installed and maintained by the company's team of trained fire system engineers. In addition to hardwired systems, Amax offers wireless options to reduce installation times, minimise disruption and help reduce costs.
